In a letter sent out to all staff in his department in June, D.A.T.E. officer Kevin Fentayri said he was fired after investigating allegations that the Nassau police department falsified their reports to make it appear they responded to sexual assault calls as well as criminal mischief incidents in various parts of the county. A week later, the department fired Fentayri, citing that he had been "discriminating against officers based on their gender and had attempted to disrupt the operation of a police department." On Thursday, a spokesperson for the Nassau Police Department said the department "no longer employs Kevin Fentayri." As part of the investigation, Fentayri, a 14-year veteran of the police department, also conducted interviews with another 19 officers and other employees of the department, a spokesperson for the city confirmed. According to him, the investigation included an analysis of 6,800-plus pages of reports from the department, and included review of video, court records and other evidence, the spokesperson said. Fentayri is not the only officer to have been fired as part of the department's investigation. On Aug. 4, Nassau County Police Commissioner Patrick Ryder fired seven officers — including a captain and a lieutenant — after a separate investigation in April found that several officers falsified reports, including a report that made it seem they had responded to calls that may have been domestic violence cases. Ryder said in a statement at the time, that the reports "were no longer factual and were altered by the officers to misrepresent the actual circumstances of the incidents." The investigation was prompted by a report from the department's Internal Affairs Bureau that some officers had made false statements during reports, according to an Aug. 9 statement from Nassau County Police. "NYPD has been able to confirm that the reports made by the Nassau County Police Department, all of which had been taken into account by Commissioner Ryder and the
